My introduction to the fiction of Paul Theroux is The Mosquito Coast and readers in search of the Great American Novel would be hard pressed to find a more thrilling definition of the term. Not that there haven't been novels of high literary merit set in mundane locations, but the Great American Novel takes its characters on a great journey--physically, spiritually, often both--and says something definitive about the U.S.A. in the era in which it is set.

Paul Theroux is a brilliant writer, crafted a really challenging key character carried that overbearing voice through the whole book in a way that made him compelling, not annoying. I read this as a teenager and related to Charlie the narrator then. Reading again in middle age, I'm fascinated with how much the crazy dad makes sense to me now.

THE MOSQUITO COAST. by Paul Theroux · RELEASE DATE: Feb. 24, 1981. The narrator of this spirited, excessive, half-successful adventure/parable is 13-year-old Charlie Fox. But the main character is Charlie's father Allie--and a character he is, in the grand (somewhat empty) tradition of eccentric, vocal, never-say die, anti-everything genius/jerks. Inventor and handyman, atheistic Bible scholar and all-around know-it-all, Allie has moved his wife and four kids (Charlie's the oldest) to a ...
